- - - - -

Seven game law violators in Louisiana have been sentenced to from 30 to 60 days in jail--by Judge Wayne G. Borah in Federal Court in New Orleans--for their offenses against wildlife conservation laws, according to reports to the Biological Survey of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. This bureau enforces federal laws dealing with wildlife.

One defendant, charged with selling woodcock, was sentenced to 60 days in jail, and an additional ^{year} 1-day jail sentence was suspended. Charged with the same offense, 4 other men were sentenced to 30 days in jail. A housewife was placed on probation for 5 years. For selling snipe, a night club operator was sentenced to 30 days in jail. Another defendant received the same sentence for possessing coots in close season.

On the same day Judge Borah disposed of 5 other cases against violators of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act and one involving a violation of the Migratory Bird Hunting Stamp Act. Possessing a robin cost one defendant $5. Another paid $25 for possessing snipe in close season, and killing plovers cost another $25. Two convicted of hunting ducks from a motor boat paid fines of $20 each.

For not having a Migratory Bird Hunting Stamp, one defendant, who later purchased and exhibited the stamp, received a suspended sentence and placed on probation for 5 years.
